Photos have various types of layers that you can use to manipulate an image. Layers are used to create and combine multiple images, change sizes, and change contrast and color. Photoshop has an extensive number of features and tools. They can make editing your photos much easier than doing it all in one step in the traditional darkroom. Seeing how a photograph is made Photoshop is a software tool that uses a raster-based (pixel-based) image editing system. You can manipulate the pixels of an image to create an image in Photoshop; you can't manipulate the actual film negative of a picture. Each layer that you apply in Photoshop is analogous to a different color in the final photograph. The layers are based on pixels and made up of grayscale (color) and transparency values. Each pixel is a dot in the grayscale, and each pixel can be a different amount of gray, be clear (transparent) or full (opaque). Photoshop layers are similar to layers used in traditional darkroom printing. Layers are used for two-color, four-color, or greater-than-four-color work. Traditional print photography uses monochromatic black and white negative film, but you can still take a black and white print. For more information on traditional darkroom printing, see Chapter 4. This section guides you through a basic Photoshop photo editing process. The following sections are just a small sample of what's available. Creating a New Document The first step to editing your photos is to open them into a new document. You need to create a new document in Photoshop to work on the photo. The easiest way to create a new document is to open an existing image that you want to work on. After you open the image file, you need to save it as a new document. Saving a file is similar to saving a file in a word processor. After you open a file and save it as a new file, you can work on the image using the tools available in Photoshop. You may also want to work on an image using a regular image-editing program, such as GIMP (www.gimp.org), in addition to Photoshop. Making sure that a file exists You can't work on a file if it doesn't exist in Photoshop. In other words, if you try to open a file that doesn't exist, Photoshop responds with

ALBANY — A troubled cleaning company is suing the city for $3.9 million, accusing it of billing its customers for electricity used to dry the sidewalk in front of the Empire State Plaza where homeless people sleep. SEE ALSO: Subpoenaed by client, Empire State Plaza fined for illegal dumping The city has ordered 85 homeless people at the plaza to vacate in favor of cleaning it, the lawsuit filed in State Supreme Court in Albany by Hoboken-based Professional Service Cleaning alleges. "PSC has been enforcing the city's orders with the help of a city-subsidized tow truck company in charge of confiscating the property of PSI's clients," according to the legal filing. "PSI's clients, including some homeless individuals, are forced to leave their property while the city pays the tow company to remove the property." The tow-truck driver company, whose services are paid for by the city, caused $10,000 in damage to the plaintiffs' vehicles, the lawsuit contends. The company is seeking $3.9 million, plus interest, for property damage, and $1 million for "future lost profits," the filing said. A judge ordered the city to hire an independent expert to do an environmental clean-up before PSI's clients could return, and city officials said they would do so. At the time, the city said PSI was in contempt of a court order and was still being billed by the city for electricity used to dry the sidewalk at the plaza. The city said it was not possible to reimburse the company for the electricity. In the lawsuit, PSI estimates the damage to its property to be $14,000 to $18,000, and says it has invoices from the city to prove it is due that amount. Acting as the city's agent, the management company hired by the city to oversee the plaza is being sued for $30,000 in related cost for cleaning up the plaza, the filing contends. PSI has been ordered by a court to pay $270 per day for each day its clients' property was detained, which could total $30,000, the company said. PSI claims that it was never asked to pay the tow company for damages to its clients' property, and that the city is not reimbursing PSI for the electricity it is being billed for. PSI is seeking a jury trial,
